Electoral Reforms in India: A Dire Need of Hour

Dr. Surender Singh Arya

India is a largest Democracy in the World and elections are the most vital and essential part in a democratic system of governance. This is a very basic which helps the people for choosing a government in a country for governing the administration functions. So, election is a process of legitimization of political power. Democratic systems can properly working when elections are free and fair and not rigged and manipulated. Regular elections are the lifeline of any democracy. Elections provides a window through which voter's express their views, opinions and anger towards the government. Like any other democracy this is true of Indian democracy as well. Regular elections have helped in sustaining Indian Democracy with small interruptions.¹

- One candidate one constituency rule must be followed. It saves a huge amount of tax payer money of the country.

Thus, in a democracy the public is most powerful entity. If the public do not vote in favour of criminals, dishonest and corrupt politicians who wish to procure their votes by money powers and others means, everything shall function adequately and the democracy will work more perfectly. Though the Election Commission is working very hard in this direction, but it cannot succeed unless and until the entire stake holder like political parties and voters not realize their responsibility and accountability. Finally there should proper mechanism, fully functional and fully prepared to fight with any inconsequence.
